...Then there's Brian Hagedorn, a Kenoshan studying law at Northwestern University. He's 27, married, has two young children and posts, according to a tag line on his blog, "reflections on culture, politics, law, philosophy and theology from a decidedly Christian perspective." Titled "Anno Domini," Latin for "in the year of our lord," Hagedorn started his blog a couple months ago. Initially, he found interesting news stories, posted links to them on his site and added his comments. But as his readership has grown, Hagedorn has begun linking to other bloggers and posting comments on their sites. "My goal is to provide, thoughtful reasonable arguments on various issues related to life," he said. "Some things provoke a lot of thought and some don't. ... I enjoy writing. I enjoy contributing to dialogue." Hagedorn has written his spin on censorship, universal education vouchers and a piece inspired by the birth of his daughter called "The Miracle of Life & What Really Matters." Another post he wrote about the prospect of the Wisconsin legislature passing an amendment to define marriage drew 23 comments and sparked a debate among bloggers about preserving marriage. "Often times it's not even me. It's other people arguing back and forth with each other," he said...
